He uses examples from Gen 11-12, 38-39, Isa 5-6, and Jer 34-35. While some of his presumptions are too speculative, his presentation of the issue of juxtaposition itself is straightforward and insightful.)

- Gentry, Peter J. "The Text of the Old Testament." Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 52.1 (2009): 19-45, esp. 43-44, n. 84. Gentry's essay both describes and criticizes the increasingly common view of a fluid text and canon until the fall of the second temple, strengthened in part by the apparent plurality of textual witnesses in the sectarian texts of the Judean desert. Gentry is inclined to see the proto-MT as dominant with many of the families of deviation, like the large-scale difference in the Septuagintal and Masoretic versions of the books of Samuel, Kings, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, as pointing to resignification by the translators and/or producers of the Vorlage of the former. He thinks the Targums later "exhibit exactly the same types of resignification that we see earlier at Qumran" (45)—are we to see Rewritten Pentateuch and biblical texts resembling the LXX Vorlage as basically the same since they both purportedly resignify? While Gentry tends toward broad categorical conclusions like these, he affirms that the nature of resignification runs across a full spectrum, citing favorably the nuanced work of Crawford, Rewriting Scripture (2008).

- classic biblical Hebrew (Gen-Kgs) and so-called late biblical Hebrew (Esther, Dan, Ezra-Neh, Chron, Eccles). He finds Jer as representing so-called transitional biblical Hebrew (cf. Isa 40-66 and Ezek). He also evaluates the relative diachronic language profile between the materials shared by the MT and LXX versions of Jer over and against the MT expansions. As the title suggests he finds Jer as transitional, fitting into the exilic period, with the MT expansion materials possibly representing slightly later transitional tendencies. This essay challenges (definitively, I think) the Thackeray-Tov thesis regarding the two translators (or translator and partial reviser), 1-28/29 and 29/30-51(52) (see pages 1-7). Pietersma goes on to make an impressive proposal, suggesting Jeremiah-LXX 1-32 portrays Jeremiah as God’s mouthpiece (conveying oracles of God), and 33-51(52) Jeremiah as the preacher of God’s word (the oracles have become reported speech), the former being the book the prophet was told to write down (37:2 [30:2 MT]; 43:4, 32 [36:4, 32 MT]) (see pages 7-9). Pietersma’s proposal creates a nice package of the book of the prophet as God’s mouthpiece (Jer-LXX 1-32), esp. the connections between chapter 1 and this “book.” Now, admittedly Pietersma had to tweak his proposal in a few ways. Tweaking hypotheses generally makes me skeptical about the viability of the said hypotheses. Yet, the situation here is so complicated that tweaking is inevitable. At any rate, I need to reflect on it further.

- van der Toorn, Karel. Scribal Culture and the Making of the Hebrew Bible. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2007. Van der Toorn's chapter entitled "Manufacturing the Prophets: The Book of Jeremiah as Scribal Artifact" (173-204, and the notes 334-40) provides a straightforward, and often sensible explanation for the compiling of the prophets from the perspective of scribal matters, with much attention to Jeremiah. Especially helpful is his comparative discussion of the Hebrew prophets and their ancient Mesopotamian counterparts (175-84). The strength and weakness of his interpretation is its clarity and categorical viewpoints. Van der Toorn attributes to scribal ingenuity the "confessions" and "oracles against the nations," reconstructs an earlier stage of the book when the prose sermons were once housed within the biographical materials. While some of his explanations seem to point in a good direction the categorical presentation is often inadequate. For example there is something to what he says about the oracles against the nations (193-94, 199), but the simplicity does not adequately explain the oracles themselves as well as the more complicated discussions of Watts (1992) and Pietersma (2007). Still, this seems an important essay, but more for reframing some aspects of the nature of producing the prophetic literature than many specific concerns with the book of Jeremiah.

Wilson provides a helpful overview of the history of the discussion of the poetic oracles, prose biography, and prose didactic sections of the book of Jeremiah (so-called A, B, and C materials). He then examines selected didactic prose sections to detect their purpose. Those which augment poetic sermons and oracles have a fairly clear function of clarifying, applying, and strengthening aspects of the preceding poetic materials. The didactic prose interspersed in the biographical sections are less clear in purpose. This latter point seems to reinforce, in part, McKane's rolling corpus thesis.
